One area of interest is providing location services. For example, a service provider may utilize location services in connection with advertising and content recommendation for a user. In such cases, the user may subscribe to a subscription service of a content provider (e.g., wireless carrier, Internet service provider, etc.) with the service provider. The content provider may provide a location-based service to one or more content servers of the content provider associated with a particular geographical region (e.g., designated area on a map). Based on a user's subscription, the user's location, and/or current context, the content server may provide content, advertisements, and/or the like to the user's content-enabled device for one or more predefined geographical regions. The user's content-enabled device may send the location information to the service provider via a positioning sensor (e.g., Global Positioning System (GPS) receiver) of the user's device. The service provider may then forward the location information to the corresponding content provider. The content provider may then provide the content, advertisements, and/or the like, for the geographical region to the content-enabled device as indicated by the location information, which may be communicated to the user's content-enabled device. However, the user's location may be based on a received signal and/or mobile device signal that may be relatively inaccurate. Thus, service providers and device manufacturers face significant technical challenges to provide location services that are accurate and efficient to service providers and device manufacturers.1.
